Commemoration Day at the University of Wednesday was not characterised by an novelty so far as the proceedings of the undergraduates were concerned. There were no brilliant coruscations of wit in the interjection in which the students indulged at intervals. The undergrad, who whiatled as Professor Boulger walked up the centre of the library during the proceedings was the most successful in the mirth-rasing line, as when the able "Varsity instructor on hearing the well-known Australian whistle call turned and gazed enquiringly round laughter rose from all parts of the classic hall. On the whole the students comported themselves quietly, and did not go beyond the limits allowed in applauding their fellows whose pleasant duty appaiding seen remove whose pleasant duty it was to interview the Chancellor to receive from his hands the rewards of their active pursuit of knowledge. When, however, Pro-fessor Rennie rose to deliver his oration a that they would mark the esteem in which the professor was held within the walls of the University by allowing him to proceed a silence. When his Excellency the Governor rose to leave the hall the undergraduates histled in good tune the National Anthem, his as the audience passed out they favored them with "Oh, my darling Clementine."
