Dear Mr Legg,

Thanks for your considerate note. I only expressed myself as I did so that you should know that relations had not always been very cordial, but, after all, Pearson attacked Yule's work at one time much more violently than ever he did mine, and Yule's obituary for the Royal Society is as kind as possible.

I have written to his son, Egon Pearson, in the hope of getting genealogical information of the kind that your general notice suggests, but I am not sure that I shall get any as I had heard that insanity had occurred among some relatives. I have, however, no personal knowledge on this point.

Yours sincerely,
