26th May 1961.

My dear Ron,

It was delightful to find your letter awaiting me when I got back from Somerset this afternoon. However, really all the points in regard to it had been cleared up by the telephone conversation we had together, which was additional to the letters.

As you know from that conversation, it will not be necessary for you to bring a dinner jacket. We do in fact change at All Souls but only on Saturdays, Sundays and certain other special occasions.

I shall be there to meet your railway train next Monday, May 29th at 12.58. We will come straight down to the College and get lunch and then you will be able to settle in. I do hope you will find everything comfortable. It is really delightful, my dear Ron, to think that we shall have this week together, and it will give full opportunity to talk and discuss the many points which I ~~am anxious~~ am anxious to do. It will also be the greatest possible help and stimulus to those in these laboratories if you could have talks with them.

I am really delighted that you will be able to stay until Saturday, June the 3rd. As I say, we shall be able to go into all our matters together. I have engagements beginning that morning, but there is a train leaving Oxford for Cambridge at 9.55 which one can catch without any rush. That is due at Cambridge at 1.29.

I look forward most eagerly to the very great pleasure of being with you and of having this opportunity of quiet discussions together and of being able to get your advice on the book I am writing. It is really wonderful to think that I have said something like this to you for nearly forty years!

Yours affectionately,
Henry.
