My dear Kenneth,

Thanks for your note. I told Kimura that I was sending it in for the next number being made up, without committing myself to which number this would be. Of course, as with so much other stuff from foreigners not very well familiar with all that has been done in England, the main thing is to give the chap the opportunity of thinking aloud, and deciding what he is to understand ^{by} ~~of~~ what other people have written.

I don't think it will be necessary for you to write to him independently.

Did I tell you that I do not mind bearing a review from Lindley which will, of course, be as hostile as can be in intention, though apparently masked with fulsome flattery, which is the part of it that might reasonably be cut out. I think it a good thing that objection should be taken, where possible, to any new lines of thought such as I have put forward in my book. No one in their senses would take a reviewers opinion as final.

Sincerely yours,
